Columbia's nuclear weekend: the skeptics and the press....

Columbia experienced an unusual "nuclear weekend" April 15-17. While skeptics of the viability and safety of a policy of continuing reliance on nuclear energy gathered for a two-day "people's conference," at USC's Russell House, a group of Southeastern journalists met at the nearby Institute for International Studies for a four-day conference announced by its university sponsors as a "balanced presentation" of nuclear issues.

Osceola editors Elton Manzione and Brad Stinson spent their weekends attending the two conferences. Here are their reports:

1. The skeptics

by Elton Manzione

It was billed as the South Carolina Nuclear Skeptic's Conference and initially I was skeptical if there would be a conference. It seemed the Fates were conspiring to keep the, as yet ungathered, group from meeting.

First there was the matter of where the conference would be held. Sponsored jointly by the Grass Roots Organizing Workshop (GROW) and the Student Committee on Political Education (SCOPE), the conference ran afoul of the bureaucracy when SCOPE's student organization charter was suspended. No student organization -- no room at the Russell House for the conference. For two days there was talk of federal court injunctions or conferences held on steps. In the end all was resolved. SCOPE was issued a temporary charter and planning went ahead. Then bad luck at the federal level struck.

It seems the mailing address for conference registration was given as 18 Bluff Road, the new GROW headquarters; easy enough for the regular mail carrier to find but an unknown address to the substitute carrier who ran the route for a week and a half. Interestingly enough the mail foul-up started just two days after GROW's mailing of invitations and continued until two days before the conference was to begin. The only

2. The press

by Brad Stinson

While the Nuclear skeptics were on one side of campus this past weekend trying to find out if they were going to have a place to hold their conference, the other side of campus was playing host to a second nuclear get-together. The second was sponsored by the Institute for International Studies at the University of South Carolina and was participated in by a small number of news media representatives from all over the southeastern United States. The idea behind the conference was to present to the participants a balanced view of the pros and cons of the nuclear controversy. As the Institute's Director, Dr. Richard Walker, told me a week before the conference, "if participants go away from the conference with the conclusion that there is no one right answer to the nuclear controversy," the program will have been a success.

Conferences more often than not turn out to be little more than a waste of time but with this conference was the potential for something different. Not only were the participants representatives of the news media, but one full day (Friday) of the four-day conference was devoted to visiting four nuclear plants in South Carolina representing four different phases of the nuclear fuel cycle. South Carolina is touted as one of the few places in the world where the whole of the nuclear fuel cycle, with the exception of the mining and milling stages, can be seen in one day.

The trip on Friday included visits to Westinghouse's Nuclear Fuel Assemblies Fabrication Plant and South Carolina Electric and Gas Company's Nuclear Containment Structure (now under construction), both located just outside of Columbia and the Allied General Nuclear Services and Savannah River Plants in Barnwell County.

The idea of having a nuclear conference for news media representatives is an interesting one, since for years the news media has been accused of controlling popular opinion.

Living nightmares

For most hours of the day, one tends to assume he's immortal. If one thinks of the future upon some spare moment, he tends to assume it holds the certainty of better times. But there are events which put one back in touch with his own mortality, and which show him in the surest way that the future is a cloud of uncertainty, a mysterious fog. Such an event happened to me yesterday, and today I bear witness of the nightmare world it left me in for a time.

You see, I was in my car, turning from the highway onto the driveway of the estate where I live. I happened to look in the rear view mirror and saw a car racing toward me. I knew it could not help but hit me, so I pulled off the road. But this driver pulled off the road too, and plowed into the rear of my car, sending it careening into some woods, and luckily some small trees saved me from being killed. Well, my car was destroyed and I was injured, but I was quite lucky to have survived the accident. I'm not complaining, not when people are being killed every minute of the day in accidents far more gruesome; not when they are maimed for life with such frequency as they are. No, I don't want any sympathy. But my purpose is to tell of the accident, thus to report a journalist's vision of the sundry chambers of horrors the local government puts accident (and crime) victims through just routinely.

Now this accident was a happenstance of fate; there is nothing I could have done beforehand to have prevented it. Early on the morning of the day, I had gotten up to fish in the warm morning sun that shone above one of the lakes on the estate. I didn't catch anything, but I was too impatient to return to my study and begin pasting up the pages of an economic journal for which I'm managing editor. All in all, a beautiful sunny Southern Saturday. So I came in by and by, and decided that before I started the paste-up, I might as well go ahead and take my dirty laundry to town and pick up some mail. Then it was on the return trip when I was hit. And just before the moment of the accident, I was feeling very contented. I had gotten two friendly letters from William F. Buckley, Jr., and was wondering when during the weekend I'd have time to write the lengthy reply I knew would be necessary.

> "...If one thinks of the future upon some spare moment, he tends to assume it holds the certainty of better times. But there are events which put one back in touch with his own mortality..."

And the next moment, my car was a total loss, lying down in a ditch. I had a sprained neck and pain ran through my body (though the near-euphoria at not being killed made me immune to any pain for a while after the accident). I knew that if I were lucky, the fellow who hit me would have insurance, and it would pay for either fixing my car or replacing it, and for whatever medical bills ensued. Some witnesses were kind enought to stop, and the police were called, and we waited the half hour it took a highway patrol car to show up.

The patrolman, when he did arrive, was brusque, perfunctory, even hostile. Maybe it was the long hair, or too deep a tan, or my lack of a redneck accent that displeased him, but he seemed in the subtlest manner to side with the fellow who hit me, though this fellow had, it turned out, a dubious title to his car and very dubious insurance. The highway patrolman spent his time filling out forms, occasionally asking me an informational question (what's your Social Security number?). He never even bothered to ask how the accident happened.

But the patrolman's indifferent callousness was nothing compared to the outright contempt I found at the Emergency Room of the Richland County Memorial Hospital. The hospital is in a new and shiny building, but the glitter could not conceal the grim horrors of the emergency room and its crew of ugly, inhospitable personnel. One doesn't get examined or treated at the Richland Memorial Emergency Room. One fills out papers, and one waits, hours upon hours.

Now I went into the emergency room feeling very ill and with the suspicion that my neck might be broken, for I couldn't lift my head if I laid back. There was also a large pressure in my head besides, and I was still dazed. But no matter. When I entered the emergency room I had to stand at the desk with several other people for 20 minutes before one of the surly clerks behind the desk condescended to ask what I was there for. (While I was waiting, a young woman came up with her baby and asked one of them how she could get her husband committed to the state hospital, since he was at home beserk. The clerk said, "I can't do anything. You'll have to go to the police to get a restraining order." She said she had gone to the police, and they refused to help. So the clerk said the woman would have to bring the beserk man, her husband, to the emergency room. Well needless to say, the woman explained that she was in fear of her life and could not do it. The clerk ended by saying, with a smirk of satisfaction on her face, "There's nothing we can do.")

When forms were filled out, I, like any other emergency room patient, was told to sit and wait. After nearly an hour, a nurse called me, to take my blood pressure, get my temperature, and ask what was wrong. Then it was back in the waiting room, for a half-hour wait. When my name was called again, I was instructed to go back into the emergency room itself. There I was led to a bed, one of several in a row of beds separated by blue curtains. And there I sat from 4:30 p.m. to about 6 p.m., when a doctor came in briefly and examined my neck.

Researchers, give thanks

This is more in the way of a public service announcement than a cheap shot. But the Richland County Library has done something that has needed to be done for a long time, and many of our readers may not know about it.

Some poor souls have worked their ways through several years of microfilm of the State and the Columbia Record and have painstakingly cross-indexed virtually every story appearing in those newspapers during the last three-and-a-half years. The library plans to prepare indexes for earlier years as time allows and will keep the index more or less up-to-date (right now it's running about three months behind).

Anyone who has attempted to do research in this state which requires trolling through back issues of newspapers will recognize immediately the value of such an index. We have used the file on a number of occasions recently and have only one minor complaint -- stories are sub-indexed by headline rather than chronologically, making it difficult to follow the chronological thread of a story which takes place over a period of months.

The indexes are available in the reference room, the microfilm in the periodicals department. The library has a machine capable of copying microfilm at reasonable rates. The county library is to be complimented on undertaking a task the state's university libraries have yet to tackle.

St. Phillips

The U.S. Coast Guard, Seventh District, now has available blueprints of the revised plans for development of St. Phillips Island (Osceola, March 25 and April 1). The plans, prepared for developer O. Stanley Smith Jr. by Lewis Clarke Associates of Raleigh, N.C., include what the Coast Guard describes as "major redesign features." In view of the redesigning and "of more complete information that has been obtained," the Seventh District has decided to prepare a revised draft environmental impact statement on the project.

Blueprints of the revised plan show Smith and his planners have transformed the St. Phillips project from a total resort development with luxury amenities into a strictly residential project. The 800-1000 acres that comprise the highland portions of St. Phillips have been subdivided into about 1200 residential lots of varying size.

A spokesman for a group of Beaufort County citizens who are opposing the development told Osceola this week his group believes the plans show as highland areas lands which are actually below the mean high water mark, and "are inaccurate in any number of particulars."

Environmentalists have criticized Smith's plans on the basis that St. Phillips is too low and too unstable to withstand the impact of a major development. Smith's original plans called for the construction of a golf course and other luxury extras, as well as 1200 residential lots. Environmentalists said the construction would result in the dredging and filling of marshland areas and would reduce the productivity of the marine ecosystems surrounding the island. Smith has claimed since 1973 that his plans are environmentally sound and has sought a permit from the Coast Guard to construct a bridge to the

Legal power

Ah, Spring. A time of awakening. And time for the annual report on legal fees paid to lawyer-legislators by the state's Big Three power companies. As usual, S.C.E.& G. led all the rest, paying out $109,370 to members of the General Assembly. Duke Power came in a very distant second, paying out $13,227, and Carolina Power & Light, in third place, paid out a niggling $2262.

Here's the lineup:

South Carolina Electric & Gas
Blatt, Fales, Bedingfield, Loadholt (Speaker Emeritus and Rep. Solomon Blatt, D-Barnwell)	$21,670
Rembert Dennis (Senator, D-Berkeley, chairman of Senate Finance Committee)	15,000
Harvey, Battey, Macloskie & Bethea (Lt. Gov. and President of the Senate W. Brantley Harvey)	10,200
Dennis and Dennis (Senator Rembert Dennis)	4,500
W. Brantley Harvey (as above)	1,200
Sanders and Quackenbush (Senator Alex Sanders, D-Richland)	55,600
T.O. Berry (law partner of Rep. Gene Dukes, D-Dorchester)	2,600
J.D. Long III (Senator, D-Union)	1200
Duke Power Company
Dennis, Dennis & Bishop (1) (Senator Rembert Dennis)	12,000
Long and Powell (Senator J.D. Long III)	610
Sanders and Quackenbush (Senator Alex Sanders)	617
Carolina Power & Light
Harris, Griggs and Spruill (Senator C. Anthony Harris, D-Chesterfield)	1,516
Sanders and Quackenbush (Senator Alex Sanders)	746

(1) Senator Dennis is a member of the firm of Dennis and Dennis. Until 1971, the firm was Dennis, Dennis and Bishop, but Duke apparently has not learned of the name change. The $12,000 is listed as "legal services and retainer." According to annual reports filed by Duke and SCE&G with the Federal Power Commission, Senator Dennis and his firm have received $281,965 in legal fees and retainers from the two utilities since 1969. This appears to be the legislative record.

foreign affair

Foreign investments?

by Val Stieglitz

It has become an article of South Carolina's public - relations faith that foreign investment is welcome here. The State Development Board endeavors to sell the virtues of the state as an investment site for foreign corporations. Politicians of almost all stripes swear fidelity to the idea of industrial expansion, and see foreign firms as central to this effort. Facts and figures demonstrating economic progress are paraded regularly by the Development Board, the Governor, or the USC Business School. It is all a rosy picture; or so it seems. Could some discomforting realities lay behind the portrait?

The fact is that foreign investment — and industrial development generally — poses potentially serious threats to what might be called South Carolina's economic establishment. Proposed industrial expansion, therefore, is often caught in the quicksand of local politics, and what emerges is a type of growth compatible with the interests of the current economic mandarinate. South Carolina is far from completely open to industrial investment despite the cherry PR line.

An actual case will make the point clearer. In October, 1969, the German - owned BASF company announced plans to build a dyestuffs and styrene complex at Victoria Bluffs in Beaufort County. The company anticipated a long-term investment of $400 million, with plans of employing 1000 people. This was heady stuff, for the southeast coastal region of South Carolina is chronically poor. The potential for enhancing the lives of many individuals and families seemed enormous. Where, then, were the welcome mats?

> "...This has the general effect of locking ever more people into low-paying, hazardous jobs. Industries which could offer alternatives are not courted with the same fervor as textile-related firms..."

On the doorsteps of the politically impotent; those who would have benefited the most. Soon after the BASF announcement, and the acquisition of 1800 acres for construction, the developers on Hilton Head Island organized major opposition. The developers feared that the plant's operations would mar the area's resort appeal, and generally interfere with a lifestyle beyond the reach of the vast majority of Beaufort Countians. The political power of the developers, and their allies residing on the Island, swamped the backers of BASF. The company had promised to adhere to any and all environmental regulations, but was forced to abandon the project in January, 1971. The established economic interests of the resort industry had prevailed over the interests of job-hungry citizens in southeast coastal South Carolina.

This case points up an ongoing conflict in the state's development effort; that between the well-established tourist industry and the promise of more jobs through economic expansion. Tourism, to a degree, requires that we shun the kind of industrial activity which could enhance the financial picture for many South Carolinians. In places where the tourist interests are strongest — mainly the coastal and beach regions — opposition to new industry will be toughest; and, those who need the jobs the most will wield the least political clout.

It would be unfair to say that South Carolina is not interested in foreign investment and industrial expansion. The state's tax structure alone is a mighty lure. The case can be made, however, that investment which promises competition with established industries receives less than a hearty welcome. In this regard it is sigificant that roughly 65% of foreign manufacturing investment in South Carolina is textile-related. About 58% of sales and service firms are tied to the textile industry. The claim that investment is diversifying the state's industrial base, therefore, should be qualified to note that most expansion is occurring in the well-established textile industry. This has the general effect of locking ever more people into low-paying, hazardous jobs. Industries which could offer alternatives are not courted with the same fervor as textile-related firms. Thus, the textile industry seems to be a primary beneficiary of foreign investment, while the gain for ordinary people is less certain.

island for almost four years. The Coast Guard is required under federal law to consider the environmental impacts of the project prior to granting a permit. Smith and his planners have radically altered the plans in an attempt to meet any Coast Guard objections.

The spokesman for the Beaufort group told Osceola that while they believe any significant development of the island will destroy its ecological integrity, "we are afraid that with these changes, Smith may come out of this wearing the white hat, saying 'I've done everything I can to appease you environmentalists.' We are going to take a hard look at these new plans, and we intend to have a lot more to say about it." The Coast Guard is expected to hold a public hearing on the revised draft environmental impact statement sometime this summer.

Blueprints of Smith's revised plans are available by writing Commander, Seventh Coast Guard District, 51 SW, 1st Avenue, Miami, FLA 33130.

Pot positions

Federal decriminalization of marijuana possession is an "emotional issue" for South Carolina's six Congressmen, according to a story published recently in the Clemson University student newspaper, The Tiger.

Tiger editors journeyed to Washington during Clemson's spring break and conducted interviews with South Carolina's congressional delegation on a wide range of issues. The results were published in an eight-page supplement to the student newspaper on April 1.

The Tiger found that all six Congressmen oppose President Carter's proposal to decriminalize pot. Herewith, the Congressmen's positions as quoted in The Tiger:

First District Rep. Mendel Davis: "Right now, you'd have to have scientific proof that it isn't harmful before it should be decriminalized."

Second District Rep. Floyd Spence: "I don't think anything good comes from the use of marijuana."

Third District Rep. Butler Derrick: "The thing that particularly bothers me is that most of those who end up on hard drugs started out in the lighter things, such as marijuana."

Fourth District Rep. James Mann: Opposes decriminalization and doubts Congress will pass a law decriminalizing federal possession of less than one ounce, but "I could easily be wrong."

Fifth District Rep. Ken Holland: "I think the states ought to develop some responsibility in that area. If South Carolina wanted to decriminalize, that's South Carolina's business."

Sixth District Rep. John Jenrette: "I guess I'm old fashioned. I basically support the South Carolina criminal law, which includes the purging of one's records after 60 days (following conviction)."

More than two months solid work and over one hundred thousand flyers to people all over the state and still only 500 or so persons showed up to support people-oriented legislation at "The People Are Coming Rally" in Columbia last Sunday. The sponsoring "Twenty Committee," including nine members of the General Assembly, were predicting quietly before the rally that thousands of people were going to show up, but the crowds didn't materialize. The group did manage to entice a three person camera crew from CBS news in New York, and they still got up and did their things -- hell-fire and brimstone sermonettes about what was going to happen to legislators who didn't start listening to the people, but thirty minutes after it started, it was over. It's just the kind of thing that makes it into the papers on Monday morning and is forgotten on Tuesday. Well, so much for people-oriented legislation.

Raitt's class act

Exhibiting a combination of masterful guitar work, a voice that in my humble opinion rates as one of the most expressive instruments around, and an unaffected sensuality that suffused and illuminated virtually every aspect of her performance, Bonnie Raitt pulled out the stops in Charlotte last Wednesday and showed the Ovens Auditorium audience what class is all about.

Backed up by tall and freaky Freebo, who has been with her since before her 1971 debut album, on fretless bass and tuba, Will McFarlane on guitar, Dennis Whitted on drums, and brand new keyboard and sax man Marty Gregg, Raitt covered material by a variety of songwriters. She ranged from early blues by purists like Mississippi Fred McDowell and her mentor Sippie Wallace, through rock by Del Shannon, Earl Randall, and Orleans' John Hall, to Jackson Browne's wistful lyricism and the country-tinged ballads of John Prine and Karla Bonhoff. Only a very few of her own songs were included in the evening's repentoire.

Although Raitt is largely a blues stylist and interpreter of other people's material, her sound is so distinctive, full of feeling and enhanced by a marked sensuality, that she has the evocative power of, say, a Joni Mitchell or Jackson Browne (and tends to command a comparable devotion from her fans). Over the last few years the natural soulfullness of what she has called her "fruity" soprano has matured into a definite underlying raunch, while maintaining the sweetness. The result is a voice that can plead, admonish, ache, moan, and scorn practically in a single phrase.

Bonnie conveys emotional subtleties better than any other singer I've heard, and on this particular evening (as on her new album, Sweet Forgiveness) displayed an increased strength and confidence that added immeasurably to the impact of her performance. The result was an evening of high energy rock and blues, counterbalanced by a sweet and slow one here and there; the downer ballads she can do so effectively were not in evidence this night.

Raitt adds her unmistakable touch to everything she performs. The effect varies; John Prine will never even approach her version of his "Angel from Montgomery," but Jackson Browne's "I Thought I Was a Child" lost some of its beguiling innocence with the bluesy edge she added to it. That same womanly worldliness gave a whole new dimension to the sterile oldie "Runaway," and fit right in with such tunes as McDowell's "Kokomo Blues" and "About to Make Me Leave Home" off her new album.

Bonnie Raitt is perhaps the only woman guitarist to be accepted as a peer by such blues giants as Muddy Waters and Junior Wells, and that talent was well in evidence Wednesday night. Skillful on accoustic as well as electric guitar, it was when she slipped that bottleneck on her finger that Bonnie really shone. The combined effect of her voice and her swooping, dizzying runs up and down the guitar neck, particularly on the medley "About to Make Me Leave Home," "Sugar Mama," and "Three Time Loser," repeatedly brought the audience to a whooping frenzy. Or it might have been a mass orgasm, hard to tell.

Bonnie Raitt

The band climbed with her, their collective energies mounting, explosive simultaneous rhythms providing a secure base for her searing forays. Or piano and guitar harmonies swelled, only to slip off into brief private melodies on ballads like "Home" and "Opening Farewell." They swung on "Good Enough," jived on "I Can Understand Why a Woman Must Have an Outside Man" (aided by an apparently reluctant road crew on percussion), and added a new sedateness to "Under the Falling Sky."

Bonnie, as a noteworthy guitarist and effective bandleader, serves as a model for many women, myself included. I was often as much absorbed in the dynamics of her interaction with her band, the comfortable and direct "first among equals" role she played with such consumate ease, as I was in their music. Like Joni Mitchell or Patti Smith, with whom she shares a powerful stage presence, Raitt projects an autonomous sexuality without at all showing that sexy chick air that is so common among women performers. To me the difference is subtle but unmistakable, and I relish seeing it.

There was nothing but nothing subtle about big, loud opening act Catfish Hodge, who deserves mention if only for the fact of his survival, relatively complete in mind and body, after a tour as solo warm-up for Bad Company. ...Think about it--frightening, isn't it?...I expect the same cheerful Well-I-don't-give-a-shit attitude, bordering on obnoxiousness, that eventually won over Bonnie Raitt's audience helped get him through the earlier stint as well.

Hodge's outrageous talking blues and one surprisingly sensitive ballad were his saving grace; accompanied by bassist Duane Campbell, his bluesy accoustic version of J.J. Cale's "Magnolia" and Randy Newman's "Lonely at the Top" were merely adequate. His almost excessive lack of pretension provided pleasant contrast for the professional tightness shown by Bonnie Raitt and her band, however. The latter had about one awkward moment, an uneven ending to a song early in the evening. Otherwise it was one magic performance, by one hell of a class act.

reason the mistake was discovered at all was because one participant called to say his registration had been returned marked "no such address."

"I don't know how many participants it cost us," cordinator Brett Bursey said, "But we got eight registrations in the two days we did have delivery." If the figure held for each of the ten days delivery was not made, the attendance at the conference may have been triple what it was.

At first the small attendance at the workshops, ranging from 15 to 30, bothered me, but then the intent and effect of the gathering became clear. Those who did attend ranged the gamut from older housewives to college students, from GI's to Ph.D's. The group was small, but not elitist. The word was "participatory." Each had his own knowledge, experience and opinion to contribute to the communal "pot."

"That's really one of the purposes of the conference," Bursey said, "to demystify atomic power. To show people you don't have to be a nuclear physicist to understand the operation of a nuclear power plant."

Aside from the deputy director of DHEC, Lamar Priester, there were no certified "experts" at this conference. Just a group of intelligent, informed and concerned individuals. While there was no parade of experts to the podium, everyone seemed to get some information from the presentations. It was an organic relationship; putting one's own information in and taking additional information out.

The conference occasionally glided into what might be termed a "counter-culture" perspective, but in reality it was hard to avoid.

The American public has been so consistently bombarded with the notion nuclear power is the only way to meet our growing energy needs that the topic of altering lifestyle had to be dealt with. But contrary to popular opinion the amount of "sacrifice" necessary would not return us to the stone age or require us all to live a life devoid of creature comforts. In 1963 we used half as much energy as we currently use. Obviously we weren't half as civilized.

This was the type of information generally presented during the conference; non-technical, socially oriented facts. It was the type of discussion which some of the conference organizers and participants tried to stay away from on the premise it would make the group sound like a bunch of wild-eyed radicals. To the contrary, the discussions along these lines were even more eloquent and sensible than those, for example, on the safety question, which invariably become bogged down in the jargon and technical mystique which the conference wished to avoid.

Even when the discussion centered around alternative power, a topic which I originally believed would be in the wild-eyed-windmill-in-every-yard mold, it remained well-grounded and sensible. Dr. Curtis Rhodes gave a well-informed presentation on solar and wind energy which I had previously tended to dismiss as unrealistic.

Rhodes pointed out the primary application of solar energy would be in the hearing and cooling of living spaces, which Rhodes said accounts for 25 percent of our energy useage; since nuclear power currently provides only three percent of our power, Rhodes noted we would only have to have 10 percent of our heating and cooling needs to be met be solar energy to enable us to completely phase out nuclear power.

"The capability of solar heating is here and feasible right now," Rhodes said. Cooling via solar energy was "a little down the road" according to Rhodes.

Rhodes expressed the opinion coal could be our future workhorse in light of its abundant supply, and in spite of its "bad public image."

"Many of coal's more distasteful aspects came about as a result of it trying to be competitive with nuclear energy. That's no longer going to be a consideration," Rhodes said.

Rhodes said much of the negativism toward coal came about as a result of comparing "coal as it has been and nuclear as it could be."

Brett Bursey on camera

After two days of what could best be termed an "input conference," the focus shifted to output in the form of proposals. The first was to form a state-wide coalition to study all aspects of the energy issue including economic, political, and ecological questions. A local study group was proposed to investigate the impact of the Barnwell fuel re-processing facility should it be operated as a multi-nation facility - a possibility which seemed likely to conference organizers.

"Carter's said he did not think it would be worthwhile as a commercial facility. That doesn't preclude its use as a multi-national operation," Bursey said.

The operation of the facility on a multi-national level would not, Bursey said, eliminate any of the more distasteful aspects of the operation.

"Barnwell will act as an interim storage facility for waste from all over the world. The waste is ultimately planned to be solidified by a yet undeveloped process and shipped to a yet non-existent Federal repository. In the meantime it will sit in South Carolina," Bursey said.

Barnwell has been called the "jugular vein" of the nuclear industry and the efforts of local groups opposing it could have a far-reaching effect on the nuclear industry as a whole.

The final proposal made by the conference was a call for a moratorium on all civilian nuclear proliferation. With nuclear weapons technology only a stone's throw from nuclear reactor technology, the proposal was designed to limit the proliferation of nuclear weapons.

"Everyone would agree a nuclear bomb is a bad thing, but the technology which makes a nuclear reactor possible is the same which makes a nuclear weapon possible," conference organizer Ted Harris said.

"There is really no distinction, except semantics, between the peaceful atom and the warlike atom," Harris said.

The results of the conference? I think it served to sow the seeds of citizen action and information. It was not designed to be a massive outcry against nuclear power. It was meant to be a forum for information and a springboard for action, and in that respect I think it was very successful.

"We feel we accomplished what we set out to do; lay the groundwork for a state-wide progressive energy coalition," Bursey said.

"I think we let people know there are concerned people all over the state."

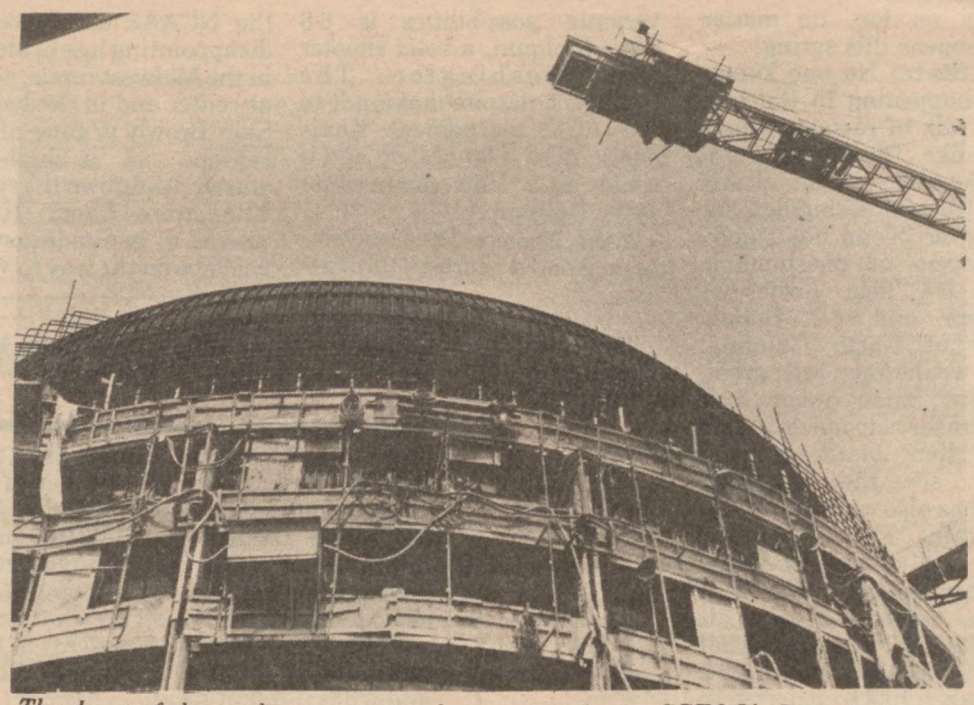
Why not gather a skeptical bunch of newspersons together, show them the nuclear fuel cycle up close, let them hear the facts and figures from both sides of the controversy and then let them decide for themselves what kind of nuclear future we should have?

It would be fruitless, obviously, to attempt to even reiterate the facts and figures thrown around at this conference by the so-called experts, much less to try to discuss the whole of the nuclear issue, but I call attention to this conference because it may be important to understanding what kind of perspective we are being given. It is crucial that we understand, in my estimation, how the news media's ideas about nuclear energy are developed. After all, the news media's understanding and conclusions regarding the nuclear question will be adopted by as much as 85 percent of the people in this country as their own view.

In this regard, there were a couple of things that I found striking about this particular conference. The first was the news media people participating. You would think that news people would be the most skeptical people in the world, especially when it comes to as serious and complicated a question as nuclear development. But with the exception of three or four people, this group of media representatives came into this conference with a predisposition towards nuclear expansion. And several that I talked to who came into the conference not sure about nuclear development went away sure that it was safe and in good hands.

Surprisingly enough, after the fourteen hour excursion we made to the four different nuclear plants in the state, there were two editors who told me that they had mixed feelings about the safety factor before they visited the facilities, but after seeing them close up they were convinced that they were safe. One other editor told me he was surprised at the simplicity of it all. Understand now that we were being escorted by the representatives of the nuclear industry, we were being given their tour, seeing what they wanted us to see. Not to say that there wasn't an occasional round of lively questioning, but the nuclear industry has a way of getting around questions they don't like to answer.

It was on Saturday that we heard the first of the anti-nuclear voices in local attorney Townsend Belser, and even he would be considered no more than a moderate among the hard core anti-nuke forces. Belser was pitted against the Executive Vice-President of Allied General Nuclear Services' Barnwell Plant and it turned into one of the liveliest debates of the whole conference. After that debate we were not to hear another anti-nuclear voice until the very last panel discussion on Sunday.



The dome of the nuclear reactor under construction at SCE&G's Parr, S.C. plant

Now it is one thing to hear both sides of the issue and to decide that nuclear development is A-OK in your book. But what we had at this conference was a good handful of people who had already been convinced by the nuclear industries' show on Friday before we ever made it to the Saturday schedule. One New York based journalist told me after the last stop on the tour that she had never realized how elaborate the precautions against accidents were and said she was convinced that the nuclear systems were safe.

The nuclear industry targeted the news media some time ago, hoping to convince the group that might have more of an effect on the general public than any other group around. The nukes figured if they can corral the better part of the media into their camp, they would have a hell of a better chance of convincing everyone else. It seemed to me that throughout this conference there was always a representative of the nuclear industry around, ready to answer very calmly and convincingly any concern that might have been raised in your mind. There was one PR man from the Barnwell plant who was along with my group on the first couple of stops on Friday. He was asking questions and making comments just like the rest of us and then all of a sudden when we got to Barnwell he became the tour guide.

But no one blames the nuclear industry for lobbying in their own behalf. The thing that bothered me was that the news media people were no more cautious than they were. There were several very good discussion sessions where some very tough questioning was carried on, but when you talked to the majority of these news people outside, during a break for example, you were convinced they were only going through the motions of asking question. Here were the people who might very well make the difference in what our nuclear policy might be, people who have a responsibility to their audiences to make some objective discoveries about nuclear development, if they are going to discuss it at all, and their minds were already made up for the most part.

I don't know if it was by accident or design, but I found this group to be of the most conservative ilk imaginable. More than half of them admitted they were poorly informed about the nuclear issue, yet the majority of that number was for nuclear development. Now this says something about what we are being spoonfed by the nuclear industry via our news media representatives. It should put us all on guard about how much attention we are going to pay to what we read in our morning paper or what we hear on the television news. You can probably bet more often than not that you are being given information by somebody who may have given very little thought to the situation.

We really need to understand that we are not always being given a clear perspective on our energy problems, that our news gatherers and distributors are not always living up to the responsibility that their positions imply.

The other problem that I find with the nuclear controversy and the problem I found major at this particular conference is that the perimeters of the debate are too narrowly defined. There is an assumption that our society and the world must continue to use an ever-increasing amount of energy each year. never is there talk about serious and dramatic changes in the way people live. Never is there a hint that people in this country can overcome their world-leading, wasteful ways. And that is how the nuclear industry would have it. Without the presumption that half of us are going to freeze to death any day now unless we go nuclear, the whole underlying basis for the arguments for full-speed nuclear development crumble like sugar cookies.

I believe that the nuclear industry, since it decided several years ago that it was time to come out of the closet and lobby for its cause, has been quite successful at confining the discussion of energy sources to the handful of fossil fuels now owned for the most part by the oil companies. Major portions of the coal and uranium reserves in this country and abroad are owned and controlled by the same companies that control the oil. We are given to believe by the energy industry that, because of poor planning by the government, we have been left with two bad choices. We must choose between running out of energy and the dangers of nuclear power. The first will surely doom us, so we must accept the second.

There has been an attempt made by the nuclear industry, I believe, to avoid giving credence to alternative sources of energy. For that reason, perhaps, or because time was limited, little attention was given at this conference to discussions of alternatives to the road we are presently travelling. As a matter of fact there were at least two speaker participants who argued, quite forcefully, that even though they felt we had made a mistake in our energy policy that we were stuck with continuing down the same mistaken path we had started out on.

President Carter, coincidentally, has taken a stand on this very subject this week with the announcement of his own energy policy. In that policy, outlined briefly on Monday, he called for a limit to "unbridled" nuclear expansion and for definitive research into alternative sources of energy. We are just really beginning to treat our energy policy with the kind of attention it should have been given years ago.

The anti-nuclear forces are just starting to get a foot in the door. They have already forced to some extent a reappraisal of the nuclear industry just by acting as a thorn in the sides of the nuclear proponents, by asking questions and demanding answers. The anti-nuclear protest is really at much the same point that the anti-Vietnam protest was in the mid-1960's. The nuclear industry still tries very hard to ignore the anti-nukes, but their presence is being felt more and more as time goes on. The nuclear industry is going to have to face up to the same kind of tough scrutiny that brought the Vietnam conflict to an end, and that is how it should be.

Ours is one of the few nations in the world that has no energy policy at all. Fortunately, Carter has decided to do something about that. Now the question, of course, is how is whatever energy program he envisions going to be Towson, Md. and 6-7 Art Jones of Hampton, Va.

North Carolina: Dean Smith wants a point guard and an All-American from his home state of Kansas, Darnell Valentine, is the one that he would like to have. So would Notre Dame and Kansas, unfortunately. Atlantan Al Wood, a 6-6 forward, is being sought to replace departed Walter Davis. And then there is King, should the Tar Heels get back in the running for his talent. With Ford, O'Koren (a late-season sensation as a freshman), and numerous other players returning who contributed heavily this past season, the Tar Heels will still be in the league next year, and probably on top, no matter what happens this spring.

N.C. State: No one knows what's happening in Raleigh. There's talk of racial conflicts and the like. The athletic dorm looks like a bus station at this point with people shipping out for all over. Sloan has signed two players of questionable ability, 6-4 Pete Keefer of Baltimore and 6-2 Donnie Perkins of North Carolina. McKoy would have been great, but now Sloan must look elsewhere for help inside if Carr leaves. Ken Matthews, the Dunbar ace that Clemson wants, has also visited Raleigh.

Virginia: The Cavs need guards and outside shooting since they are set inside with Fulton, Castellan, et. al. They've got 6-3 guard Ken Hall committed and Tom Hicks, a 6-2 New Yorker, has transferred in from Tulane. Also on the list of Virginia possibilities is 6-6 Dave Mulquin, a solid shooter from Washington. The Cavaliers, despite making it to the ACC tournament finals again, need a lot of help and it could be a long summer for Terry Holland.

Wake Forest: The Deacons, fresh from a journey through the NCAAs that ended in a disappointing loss to Marquette in the Midwest finals, need help at center and in the backcourt. Skip Brown is gone after four seasons as a high-scoring starter. And down the stretch, 6-11 center Larry Harrison proved to be inadequate. Help could be on the way to Winston-Salem in the form of 6-11 Justin Ellis of Washington, D. C., who is also considering Colorado. Wake coach Carl Tacy would also like Dunbar's Matthews (to replace Brown) and would like to get Art Jones away from Driesell. Fran McCaffrey of Philadelphia is also getting a look.

He left, and perhaps a half-hour later, two orderlies came to roll me into the hall near the X-ray room. There I waited 20 minutes, on my back, after which a friendly nurse X-rayed my neck. And then, after being rolled again back to the bed cubicle, I waited more, this time until 8 p.m. This was the longest wait, and the most depressing. I had nothing but blank white walls to look at, and only the giggles of the nurses laughing with the doctors to listen to. Those doctors stood around screwing off for what seemed like an interminable period, while I and the other emergency patients in the other cubicles, sat in stone isolation and waited. Of course, I still did not have any idea what was wrong with me and what it might mean.

A little after 8 p.m., the doctor finally dropped by to tell me there was no fracture and that I would be released after a cervical collar was given me, along with a prescription for the pain. Now, was he so long delayed because there were more serious emergencies in need of care? No, there was one woman who had a nosebleed and was a regular emergency room patient and there was a student who had an elbow dislocated, and a boy who had cut his foot and a poor trembling prisoner, a bearded young white man who thought he was paralyzed, and whose suffering never phased the bored fat policeman who accompanied him.

Thank God I'm out of that nightmare now. The pain is still there, but it'll be gone in a few days. And tomorrow I must cope with the problem of how I get my car paid for and whatever. I haven't the faintest idea of what to do, who to see, how to get my life back to normal. But I'm thankful I escaped the hell of the emergency room's grim desolation, and I feel the greatest sympathy for those many people who come into the emergency room in serious trouble. They come seeking help. What they receive is bureaucracy at the hands of the most contemptuous clerks; medical treatment at the hands of the dregs of the medical profession; and the existential hell of an endless waiting room.

The political power of these established interests is great. Who in the Spartanburg County Council is going to do anything to bring competition to the textile industry? At a more fundamental level, who is going to propose changes in the tax laws to inject at least a semblance of equity into the distribution of wealth made in the state? The answer must be — no one. Established and vested interests dominate South Carolina's politics, and foreign investment generlly follows its patterns. Foreign investment benefits from the same exploitive tax structure as the local elite. The resolution of the foreign investment question — what kind, where, on what terms — hinges ultimately upon successfully attacking the structured inequity at home.

carried out. Whatever the plan, the fact that we are now moving towards a definitive energy policy is a step in the right direction. It makes no sense at all to say that we must continue on in our mistakes. If we are wrong, then we have a responsibility to do what we now know to be right, regardless of how much it hurts or how other countries respond.

No one suggests that we leave other countries we have led down the nuclear path holding the bag. We've got to accept our part of the blame. But there is more than one way to be a leader. Our leadership in the energy field doesn't have to end just because we back off from our old ideas about nuclear development while other countries decide to carry on. We've got to make our opinions known, we've got to keep in mind that we can provide the leadership in alternative areas of energy development. The nuclear advocates would have us believe that the reason for protests against nuclear development is fear of the unknown, yet they use fear as an argument when they say we are going to lose our leadership position in the world if we don't go nuclear. I, for one, would much rather grin and bear it now, rather than come up twenty or thirty or even 100 years from now and have to accept responsibility for what we knew to be a mistake in the first place.

There are good things that can be said about this conference. Even though I found it less well balanced than the organizers claimed it would be, that didn't doom the whole of the conference to failure. You can learn a lot about the nuclear industry by listening to what they have to say. Obviously they are feeding you the propaganda that they have memorized, but you must remember that they have a lot invested in this industry, and they have become very defensive about the criticism. They have become totally locked into a cause. The time and money they have invested has taken away any objectivity they might have once had. There minds are no longer open about the subject. They will add whatever additional safeguards that the government demands but they won't take no as an answer to the question of expanding nuclear development.

The conference even fell at a most appropriate time. Carter had just made his announcement to put a moratorium on commercial nuclear reprocessing last week. The Barnwell plant was still buzzing when we were there over that decision and over their own future as affected by that announcement. Also, there was a very informative though brief, discussion on the international consequences of our nuclear policy decisions. (It should be noted that this conference was put together in a very big hurry as conferences go, yet it was well orchestrated for the most part.)

It may very well turn out that the nuclear industry is going to be expanded to some extent or all the way through the breeder-reactor and the reprocessing cycle. The point of this little scenario, however, is to say that let's know what the hell we are doing before we do it. One of the reasons right now that we are in the mess we are in, is that South Carolina's nuclear decisions have up until this time, at least, been made primarily on the basis of politics. One of the big reasons that Allied General Nuclear Services has spent close to a quarter of a billion dollars at the Barnwell plant here in South Carolina and is now faced with possibility of losing it all is that the only thing you had to do at the time they began work was to convince a handful of politicians in the state to go along with you. And all you really had to do to convince that handful was to show them a potential increase in employment or a higher tax base and you were 90 percent along the way. But let's hope now that we've seen the last of those days....

ORDER OF PUBLICATION
State of South Carolina
County of Richland
IN THE FAMILY COURT
Betty Jean Rossman, Plaintiff,
vs.
Glenn Gaylord Rossman,
Defendant.
It appears from the attached Affidavit of Betty Jean Terrell (Rossman), Plaintiff, and from the verified Complaint on file in the Office of the Clerk of Court for Richland County that the above entitled action has been commenced and is now pending in this Court, and that the subject matter of this action is a Divorce, or annulment.
It further appears that the Defendant, Glenn Gaylord Rossman, has left his last known address and cannot be found and that his present whereabouts are unknown. Therefore, in accordance with SS 20-107, 10-451 to 10-454 of the Code of Laws of South Carolina, 1962, as amended.
IT IS ORDERED that the service of the Summons and Notice in this action be made by publication of the same in the Osceola Newsweekly, a newspaper published weekly in the City of Columbia, County of Richland, State of South Carolina. This paper is designated as being most likely to give notice to the Defendant; and the paper is to run the Summons and Notice once a week for three (3) consecutive weeks, with the first publication to be within ten (10) days from the date of this Order.
AND IT IS SO ORDERED.
JOHN R. T. MAJOR,
CLERK OF COURT FOR
RICHLAND COUNTY
Columbia, South Carolina

Roundball recruiting. . .

By Jim Walser

"...Basketball junkies who packed LIU were getting high on Al King's genius. What they were seeing was the end of legend, the finest schoolboy player in the nation bringing honor to his craft one more time..."

--New York Post
Feb. 28, 1977

Newspaper writers who have seen Brooklyn high schooler Albert King play basketball are quick to hyperbolize about his awesome abilities -- and where King decides to attend school will likely steal the story of college basketball recruiting, 1977.

And why not? It's not every day or even every year that a player in high school is a coast-to-coast household word, featured in a two-part Sports Illustrated feature story, lusted after by more coaches than anyone can keep track of. Not since Kareem Abdul Jabbar (then called Lew Alcindor) in 1966 has any new New York player created the kind of prep school excitement that King generated for the past three years. One college coach has already said of the 6-7 King: "Wherever he decides to go next season, that school will be rated in the Top Ten. If he goes to South Dakota State, then they will be ranked in the Top Ten. He's that good."

King's primary attributes are his scoring and leaping abilities (he got 41 points and 20 rebounds in the game cited above, a losing effort in which his team scored just 59 points), but he is also an unselfish player with great maturity. He is the brother of two-time All-America Bernard King of Tennessee, but it seems certain that he will not end up in Knoxville.

Earlier, North Carolina was given the lead in recruiting King. But Dean Smith, since the days of Charlie Scott and then Bob McAdoo, has been reluctant to sign players who might be tempted to over-shadow the team concept so intrinsic to UNC's recent success. King has visited Kansas State and Arizona State, plans to visit UCLA and Maryland and will have two other choices (players may visit six schools and almost invariably select one of those which they visit).

King has indicated that he's in no hurry to sign and might take as long as most of the summer to figure out what he is going to do. Meanwhile, Lefty Driesell might sprout an ulcer or two during the waiting period.

Just up the road a piece from King's Fort Hamilton High was another recruit that had coaches beckoning daily. That was 6-8, 240 pound Wayne McKoy of Long Island Lutheran High in Brookville. McKoy did things like score 70 points in one game this season, blocked shots by the dozen, and had just about decided to attend N.C. State (he had at least cursorily considered the University of South Carolina). But, apparently, a wave of dissension that struck Norm Sloan's team at season's end resulting in three transfers (Brian and Steve Walker and Dirk Ewing) and likely to influence Kenny Carr to turn professional convinced McKoy that his future lay elsewhere. He signed with St. John's last Friday, rejecting State, Maryland, Tennessee and Cincinnati, the other finalists. Almost unnoticed in the furor over McKoy selecting St. John's was news that another New York prospect, Ron Plair of Bryant High, also chose that school, over Maryland, Clemson, Louisville and Rutgers. Thus, St. John's coach Lou Carneseca seems likely to emerge with the East's best recruiting year.

Clemson's Foster

As for how some other schools are faring, here's a list of the current mix of rumors, speculation and what few facts are available:

Clemson: It seems as though Clemson enjoyed the services of one 7-1 Tree Rollins for at least a decade, but now he is gone and coach Bill Foster has the unenviable job of replacing him -- or disguising things so no one will miss him. Foster has landed 6-10, 250 pound center John Campbell of Anderson Junior College, but there remains some question about his ability to transfer to Clemson after only one junior college season. With a half-dozen forwards back from last year's 22-6 team, Clemson is stable there, but could use a high quality guard. Ken Matthews of Dunbar High in Baltimore (Skip Wise's high school) is being recruited and so is Charles Carter of Macon, Ga. At least one other big man is receiving attention. He's 6-11 Gil Salinas of San Antonio, Texas, who is also getting a look from several other ACC schools. Whatever happens this spring, Clemson will field a formidable squad next fall for its final season under NCAA sanctions. But unless a couple of good freshmen are brought in now, 1978-79 could be a bit of a problem. In the ACC, time doesn't stand still for anyone.

Duke: Without much doubt, the Blue Devils have had the best recruiting year in the ACC thus far -- and no team needed it more. Gene Banks, a 6-7 forward from Philadelphia who has been likened to George McGinnis of the 76ers, signed early with the Blue Devils and it's helping Duke considerably. Two other forwards and two transfers are already signed, and coach Bill Foster is looking at several other forwards and a couple of guards. With center Mike Gminski, the ACC rookie of the year, and 6-5 swingman Jim Sparnarkel returning, Duke may build a contender by next season.

Maryland: Driesell needs King, or someone of comparable ability if not press clips, to replace Olympian Steve Sheppard, although everyone else returns from last year's injury-prone team. So far Driesell has lost McKoy, but has recruited guard Greg Manning of Stelton, Pa. The Terps have also looked long and hard at 6-9 Pete Budko of
